I ask my workshop participants, "What's one thing that you're not currently doing but would do really well if you could?" I then ask them: "When we're finished the following week, can you please show me what you did?" "So what do you want to create this week?" I ask my participants again. Now they're all thinking about things for their businesses and their lives. There's something about that question that really activates people. Once you ask people what they want to create this week, it's no longer about building something. It's about creating something. Then I ask my participants, "So what do you want to create this week?" And most of the time they say, "well, I'm not sure." What do you say? Maybe you want to set clear goals that you can check off for the week, or you just want to know what you want to create. Whatever the goal
